“The Role of Universities in Fostering Social Innovation”

In the current global emphasis on knowledge economy, universities are located at the core of the call for social innovation. With new developments in technology and ICT communities the patterns in relationships are changing, for instance, between professors and students and universities and their communities. At a broader level, the diversification of the higher educational offer, through the introduction of new private universities as well as through new programs, aims at reducing the burden currently placed on public universities. This renewed centrality of the university calls for an attention to its role as a fundamental institution in shaping society. Institutions have above all semantic functions to confirm and re-confirm certain orders and to establish the reference for their evaluation. But the meanings and values attached to them are far from being stable, or uncontested, and a focus on this instability and ambiguity offers insights on how social innovation might originate from institutions. The university is highly relevant for discussions on citizenship, civic consciousness and state society relations. By discussing its role for social innovation, this dialogue addresses questions such as the democratization of education, the relation of knowledge and power, and access to the labour market.
